Course overview:

It is often said that China is the world's oldest continuous civilization. What does that mean? How might we understand or translate the term "China," over the course of those five or so millennia? How was it bounded or held together by geography, language, traditions, culture, and political institutions? What was its relationship with what lay beyond? By the end of this class, students will be able to reflect on these questions in a more historically informed way that will enrich their understanding of Chinese civilization and its meaning in their modern lives. The course will be organized chronologically, studying China at different times from the past to the present, considering official documents, art, archaeological evidence, and a variety of other supplementary sources that illuminate China from various perspectives. This is a CAR M course (Cluster Area Requirement, Chinese history and culture). The course does not satisfy the ER/EW requirement in coordination with ELC, but it does require both reading and written work in English.

Intended outcomes:

(a) understand the important changes in Chinese history and the major characteristics of Chinese culture.

(b) identify the diverse perspectives on Chinese history and culture.

(c) reflect on a variety of historical topics and events from different perspectives.

(d) develop a strong interest in Chinese history and culture.
