Multiple Sclerosis: Coping with Complications Barry Farr, MD, 2016-06-06 There is no miracle cure for multiple sclerosis. But there are ways to reduce its negative impact. What better source than a physician who battled MS as a patient for 24 years. Unlike the cure for MS books published for decades, none yet deemed valid by the scientific community, this one aims to help patients deal with the reality of chronic complications of MS, sharing new strategies. Why new ones? Older strategies didn't work so well. For example, using long recommended conventional medical wisdom, MS patients still got more urinary tract infections. Dr. Barry Farr tells how he avoided urinary tract infection for 20 years despite being high risk. When conventional approaches didn't relieve severe rib fracture pain, he tried something different. The pain disappeared. After 3 aspiration pneumonias during 7 months, he made a change and had none over 7 years. Being new, such strategies won't be found in other books for MS patients.

Coping with Multiple Sclerosis June S. Malone, 1991 Three stress and coping models with hypothesized relationships among negative affectivity physical disability internal health locus of control and negative mood were tested It was hypothesized that negative affectivity would be a significant predictor of negative mood and that self reported physical disability and an internal health locus of control would not be significant predictors of negative mood Multiple indicators of each construct were collected from 199 multiple sclerosis patients Using structural equation analysis two of the three models showed an acceptable fit with the data In each of the two models that fit negative affectivity had the greatest impact on negative mood In the first model a direct relationship between physical disability and negative mood was hypothesized and this path was not found to be significant In the second model the effect of physical disability on negative mood was mediated by internal health locus of control and although the indirect effect was significant the strength of the relationship was relatively small compared to the relationship between negative affectivity and negative mood A hierarchical regression was also conducted and results confirmed the hypothesis that once negative affectivity is controlled physical disability and internal health locus of control do not contribute significantly to the variance in negative mood The implications of the results for research and treatment are discussed
