Julie Hunt Johnson, 2020 This research study seeks to examine several critical gaps in our understanding of coping with discrimination This research study was one of the first to examine developmental trends in coping with discrimination from high school to college African American college students n 66 Mage 21 20 reported that their coping with discrimination strategies have improved since high school including educating and advocating resisting and support seeking This study also examines the relationship between personal coping resources and coping with discrimination strategies Agency ethnic identity and self esteem emerged as significant predictors of coping with discrimination strategies This study investigated personal coping resources and coping with discrimination strategies in relation to a specific event of discrimination and was one of the first to empirically examine forgiveness as a process within the context of racism Results suggest that forgiving a single act of discrimination nested within a larger system of racism may present additional considerations for the process of forgiveness Practical implications for future research are discussed Coping with Discrimination

Joanie Marie Mitchell, 2015 This research utilized data from the National Survey of American Life NSAL to examine the effect of discrimination on health among various sub groups in the black population African American and Afro Caribbean women and men The stress process model was used to investigate whether anger inflicted by discrimination had a negative impact on mental and physical health In addition the stress process model was also used to investigate protective influence of various forms of coping in face of such an unfair treatment Results indicated that anger inflicted by discrimination was indeed harmful for one s health consistently across the gender and ethnic subgroups in the black population except for Afro Caribbean men In addition the most common forms of coping were not necessarily helpful in reducing the negative impacts of discrimination on health or promoting health directly The importance of more systematic and long term focused research on coping with discrimination to reduce the negative health effects of anger is discussed Games and Play in HCI
