

Pyramid construction

Egyptian pyramids are funerary monuments built in the honour of pharaohs. Their building started when a king was crowned and finished when he died. It was essential to count with architects with technical skills and, of course, thousands of people for several decades who would work on a shift basis or full time. Even though the building techniques used have been the centre of many debates, experts coincide in stating that a variety of ramp systems were undoubtedly needed for the transportation of the stones.

Working for a god

Pyramid builders considered that taking part on these works provided them not only with a salary, but the opportunity to achieve a life beyond this world. The Egyptians lacked complex machinery or draught animals, so that all the works were performed by hand and thanks to collective efforts. The burning heat of the desert forced medical assistance to stay near the working places. Also, when specialised workers lived in the crowded camps nearby and shared long working days.

Based on hierarchies

Egyptian architecture significantly reflected the power that supported it. All the activities were organised following a pyramid structure. The pharaoh government structure was at the top of the organisation that was responsible under the pharaoh's authority of the Egyptian pharaohs. Nothing was done without his control, supervision and management. The pharaoh's authority was the central point of the pyramid structure.
