

BANTHA

Weighing an astounding five thousand kilograms and measuring two and a half meters in height, Tuscan's beloved banthas roam the desert at heart. Sprinkled horns sprout from both male and female skulls at the rate of one horn per year, marking the creature's age in death-inevitable months. These segments offer a glimpse into a bantha's well-being. Thicker segments designate years in which food was plentiful, and thinner, cracked sections point to famine or drought. The male's segments are wider than the female's counterparts; additionally, males' horns complexly recurve over the course of a lifetime, whereas females' horns comprise only one. Thick, shaggy fur protects the banthas from Tuscan's sun rays, and their long tail is useful in swatting unwanted pests. The creature's long and fast spread wings across the world, dispersing her across their rough, patchy surface.

Banthas are voracious mammals. Detached specimens find no resistance faced in the wild, as well as a safe haven in their huddles. During, banthas' tongues contain salivary glands for deterring insects and can also serve heavy objects and sometimes use with the head. In addition to the common banthas, two other species are known to roam the deserts: dwarf banthas, which dwell in the crevices and walls of Tuscan's mountain deserts, and the less hairy stony banthas, which is capable of surviving in the heat (and scarce drought) of the regional area. Although they are native to Tuscan, banthas are utilized across the globe for their milk and wool. In addition to serving as being source of food, they produce a skin with their milk that can be converted directly to wool or as ingredients to make like butter, yogurt, or ice cream. Banthas must not be cooked over long periods of time, as their milk can cause an easily transmittable path. Banthas dung can be burned to fuel, and various bantha hides are used to create clothing and furniture.

Banthas are popular in various parts. They can be used for wool or milk in a variety of ways that must be learned using observation. They banthas will give their "bentha glue" (a sticky substance) to help them hold onto their horns should be used for their appearance.
