Abstract: The study of the multiple processes involved in learning how to read can contribute towards the early detection of good and bad readers. However, it is necessary to take into consideration different biopsychosocial risk factors (pre- and perigestational, neonatal, medical, developmental and family-related) that may have a significant impact on neurodevelopment, producing atypical cognitive development that could lead to the presence of reading difficulties. The objective of this study was to identify the main psycholinguistic abilities involved in the early reading performance and analyse their relationship to biopsychosocial risk factors. A total of 110 subjects between the ages of 4 and 7 years old and enrolled in state-run schools in Spain participated in the study. Significant correlations were found between different psycholinguistic abilities and certain biopsychosocial risk factors (having had hyperbilirubinemia, having obtained a score lower than 9 on the Apgar test, having had language problems or a sibling with dyslexia). This relationship should be taken into account in the study of learning difficulties as a potential indicator to predict later reading development and even the presence of developmental dyslexia.

1. Introduction

Developmental dyslexia is defined as a neurocognitive learning disorder affecting reading and writing characterised by the persistent and specific non-fluid identification of words in children who do not present sensorial deficits, intellectual disabilities, other mental or neurological disorders, psychosocial adversity, or inadequate educational experiences [1]. It seems to originate from an alteration in neurodevelopment, and at the present time, its aetiology is recognised as being multifactorial, involving multiple interacting risk factors, which may be genetic or environmental [1,2]. These risk factors alter the development of multiple neural systems and the cognitive functions necessary for normal development, thereby producing the behavioural symptoms which define DD [3]. Given that additional environmental factors increase the risk of developing this reading disability and its related neuropsychological components, it can be supposed that different ecological niches moderate the strength of the genetic signal in accordance with a more articulated framework of gene-environment (GxE) interaction and interdependence [4,5]. Thus, the learning of reading is a complex issue as it requires mastery of multiple processes and the involvement of many factors.
