Researchers are interested in student learning in biology classes and the techniques that benefit learning. They visited lecture classes and quantified the amount of time spent in activities, such as lecturing, demos, clicker questions, working in groups. The researchers decided to focus on working in groups. The researchers complete an experiment where some students learn a topic with a group (group learning) whereas other students learn a topic by themselves (no group learning). In the two categories of students (group learning and no group learning), the researchers measured the student retention of material as a quantitative variable. Although the researchers determined that students working in groups learned 1.8 times better than students who did not work in groups, the results were not statistically significant. Side note: 1.8 times definitely makes this biologically significant in my book and is a reason I use group learning (aka discussion) in my classes.
