Reviews of Computing Technology, 1990 One of the most frequently heard terms in the computer industry these days is client server. There is much misinformation available on the topic and competitive pressures on software vendors have led to a great deal of hype with little in the way of supporting products. The purpose of this document is to explain what is meant by client server applications, why the Advanced Technology and Architecture (ATA) section of the Information Resources Management (IRM) Department sees this emerging technology as key for computer applications during the next ten years and what ATA sees as the existing standards and products available today. Because of the relative immaturity of existing client server products, IRM is not yet guidelineing any specific client server products except those that are components of guidelineed data communications products or database management systems.
