

Comparative Neuropsychology of Cortical and Subcortical Dementia

Morris Freedman and Marlene Oscar-Berman

ABSTRACT: The terms "cortical" and "subcortical" dementia are controversial; however, the clinical distinction between them is real. For example, although Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease (prototypical of cortical and subcortical dementia, respectively) share clinical features, they differ in the presence of aphasia, apraxia, and agnosia in Alzheimer's disease but not in Parkinson's dementia. We review our studies aimed at clarifying the mechanisms underlying the differences between these neurological disorders. Experimental paradigms adopted from animal models were used to study the functional anatomy and neuropsychological characteristics of Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease. The tasks administered include delayed alternation (DA) and delayed response (DR), which are sensitive to frontal system damage, and tactile discrimination learning (TDL) and reversal (TRL) paradigms sensitive to parietal system damage. Alzheimer's patients were significantly impaired on all tasks whereas Parkinsonians with dementia were impaired only on DR and TRL. Consideration of neuroanatomical and neuropsychological mechanisms involved in DA, DR, TDL, and TRL appears to have sharpened the distinction between Alzheimer's and Parkinson's dementia. Dementia in Alzheimer's disease may involve dorsolateral frontal, orbitofrontal and parietal systems. In contrast, dementia in Parkinson's disease may involve prominent dorsolateral frontal system damage.

RÉSUMÉ: Neuropsychologie comparative des démences corticales et sous-corticales. Les termes démence "corticale" et "sous-corticale" sont des termes controversés; cependant, la distinction clinique entre les entités qu'ils désignent est réelle. Même si la maladie d'Alzheimer et la maladie de Parkinson par exemple (respectivement prototypes de la démence corticale et sous-corticale), ont des manifestations cliniques communes, elles diffèrent par la présence d'aphasie, d'apraxie et d'agnosie dans la maladie d'Alzheimer et leur absence dans la démence du Parkinson. Nous revoyons nos études visant à clarifier les mécanismes sous-jacents aux différences entre ces entités neurologiques. Nous avons utilisé des paradigmes expérimentaux adaptés des modèles animaux pour étudier l'anatomophysiologie et les caractéristiques neuropsychologiques de la maladie d'Alzheimer et de la maladie de Parkinson. Parmi les épreuves administrées citons: l'alternance différée (AD) et la réponse différée (RD) qui sont des épreuves très sensibles à l'atteinte du système frontal; l'apprentissage de la discrimination tactile (ADT) et l'apprentissage de l'inversion tactile (AIT) qui sont des paradigmes sensibles à l'atteinte du système pariétal. Toutes les épreuves étaient significativement anormales chez les patients souffrant de la maladie d'Alzheimer, alors que seulement les épreuves de la RD et de l'AIT étaient altérées chez les parkinsoniens. L'étude des mécanismes neuro-anatomiques et neuropsychologiques impliqués dans l'AD, la RD, l'ADT et l'AIT semble avoir précisé la distinction entre la démence de la maladie d'Alzheimer et celle de la maladie de Parkinson.

Comparative Neuropsychology of Cortical and Subcortical Dementia

Although non-human animal models have long supported a role for focal cortical and subcortical brain structures in a variety of cognitive functions¹⁻³ it is only recently that parallel concepts have emerged linking circumscribed pathology to intellectual deficits in humans with neurological disease.⁴⁻⁶ The anatomical and physiological mechanisms underlying these intellectual deficits, however, are poorly understood. "Subcortical dementia", the term originally applied to the constellation of human cognitive deficits attributed to subcortical brain damage is characterized by 1) memory loss; 2) impaired manipulation of acquired knowledge (i.e. calculating and abstracting ability); 3) personality changes marked by apathy and inertia; and 4) general slowness of thought processes.⁴ In contrast to subcortical dementia is the concept of "cortical dementia" which refers to the pattern of cognitive deficits attributed to pathology in the cerebral cortex.^{4,5} The cortical dementias share many features with subcortical dementia, but are distinguished from subcortical dementia by the presence of aphasia, apraxia and agnosia.⁷

Although useful clinical concepts,^{7,8,9} subcortical and cortical dementia have been challenged as valid anatomical entities
