

Compartment Syndrome

Circulatory Pathophysiology

1. Normal Circulation

2. Swelling and increased pressure

3. Small vessels are occluded

4. Pulse still can be felt

When intra-compartmental pressure is normal, blood can flow freely through arteries, arterioles and capillaries.

With impending compartment syndrome, smaller blood vessels become occluded and cannot maintain circulation. When intra-compartmental pressure exceeds diastolic blood pressure, arteriolar and capillary perfusion are blocked and the muscles within the compartment become ischemic.

At the same time, however, the systolic pressure may still force blood through the arteries of the compartment, distally producing a pulse and capillary refill despite established compartment syndrome.

Pulselessness is a very late sign indicating intra-compartmental pressure has risen enough to surpass systolic blood pressure and occlude a major artery.

There is now total ischemia and fully established compartment syndrome. Tissue damage is likely severe and may necessitate amputation.
