competing with flexible lateral organizations

by Richard Schonberger

As a result of the success of the Japanese production system, the Japanese have been widely credited with the invention of the just-in-time (JIT) system. In fact, the JIT system is a natural outgrowth of the Japanese production system, which is based on the concept of "pull" production. In the JIT system, the customer's demand is the only source of demand for the manufacturer. The manufacturer produces only what the customer wants, when the customer wants it. This is in contrast to the traditional "push" production system, in which the manufacturer produces goods based on a forecast of demand. The JIT system is a more efficient and cost-effective way of producing goods, and it is the only way to compete with the flexible lateral organizations of the Japanese.

Richard Schonberger is a senior consultant at the MIT Center for Advanced Production Management.
