

infographics. Because they can be extended vertically, infographics conventionally include captions of the sources used to create the infographic, typically at the very bottom of the page. Depending on the infographic creator and the audience and purpose of the infographic, these can be more or less formal (i.e., in a specific citation format); infographics aimed at an audience of scientists might have more of an imperative to cite formally, whereas infographics meant to entertain or instruct the general public might use less formal citations, as the “A Traveler’s Guide to Tap Water” infographic source list, shown in Figure 9. The list, which appears at the very bottom of the infographic, includes brief identifying phrases and a link to the related site.

Paraphrasing and Quoting

So then when is it more appropriate to paraphrase (put the content of someone else's ideas into your own language), than to quote someone's words as they said them? The basic rule of thumb is to think about what point you're making, and whether it's best illustrated or supported with an explanation, or whether it matters how someone has said something.

Use paraphrase when...

- The content you want to incorporate into your composition is more factual or data based (you don't need to directly quote someone else's presentation of statistics, for instance)
- You want to maintain the flow of your own prose. Too many "undigested" quotes makes a piece feel choppy. Plus, it creates the impression of laziness on the composer's part: "well, I'll just let someone else go ahead and say this."
- You want to incorporate only information that's relevant to the topic of your composition (you can also use paraphrase and quoting)
