

Chapter 3 - Age-level Characteristics

3.1 - Preschool and Kindergarten (3,4,5 yrs)

3.1a - Physical Characteristics

- Extremely active, have good motor control and enjoy activity for its own sake
- Because of an inclination towards bursts of activity, they need frequent rest periods. They themselves, typically don't know when to settle down
- Preschoolers large muscles are more developed than those that control fingers and hands, in turn, leaving them clumsy and typically incapable of skills like tying shoes and buttoning coats
- Young children find it difficult to focus their eyes on small objects, so their hand-eye coordination might be imperfect
- Although children's bodies are flexible and resilient, the bones that protect the brain are still soft
- Gender differences in physical development and motor skill proficiency are usually not noticeable until kindergarten and are fairly small

3.1b - Social Characteristics

- Most kids have 1 or 2 bestfriends
- Socially flexible, usually willing to play with most other children
- Play activities are important and should be encouraged
- These children show definite preferences for gender of play peers and pairs vs group play
- Awareness of gender roles and gender typing is evident

3.1c - Emotional Characteristics

- Express emotions freely, anger outburst are frequent
- Jealousy among classmates is common due to actively seeking approval from their instructors

3.1d - Cognitive Characteristics

- By age 4, many children begin to develop a theory of mind
 - Concerns the ability of children around the age of 4 to be aware of the difference between thinking about something and expressing it
- Kindergarteners are quite skillful with language, most of them like to talk, especially in front of a group

Alternate Chapter Applied Psychology:

Applied Psychology John W. Santrock,1999-10-01 Applied Psychology in Personnel Management Wayne F. Cascio,1982 Applied Psychology Bernard Capen Ewer,1923 The peculiarly ambiguous character of applied psychology at the present time makes it appropriate to preface this book with an explicit statement of its purpose The current development of the subject shows two widely divergent tendencies The field covered by the subject is already large and is expanding rapidly hence it has seemed best to limit the contents of the book to fundamental principles and the significant results attained in the three divisions of the field which have been most thoroughly explored namely education psychotherapy and the psychology of industry together with numerous illustrations drawn from other departments The critical statement of principles is the most important part of the book since it is by its misunderstanding of these that popular applied psychology usually goes astray Throughout I have tried to keep the exposition as close as possible to common experience Here psychology often succeeds only in giving precise form to what wise persons have long known or reasons for what they have always done but it is none the less desirable to have such exactitude and rationality scientifically established This is perfectly genuine applied psychology though the fact is sometimes obscured in the atmosphere of experimental investigation
