

Dynamic Control Analysis:

Flight Path Control

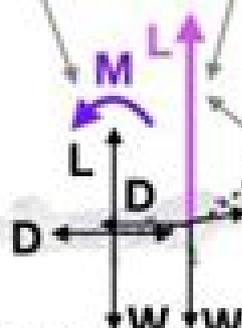

Elevator only

(Throttle constant):

Elevator changes flight path much more quickly than throttle.

Elevator deflection creates pitch up moment.

Aircraft responds to moment and pitches up.

Lift and induced drag increase massively, as angle of attack increases.

Airspeed slows down because weight develops component opposite to flight path. Decreases lift.

Upward acceleration is never very strong; airspeed builds gradually, and as soon as airspeed starts building and vertical velocity starts developing, AOA is reduced due to the change in flight path.

On the normal side of the power curve, climb continues, because more power is fed into the system than is required for level flight (since airspeed is lower, power required is lower because of a reduction of losses due to parasite drag).

Angle of attack changes on time scale of short period mode.

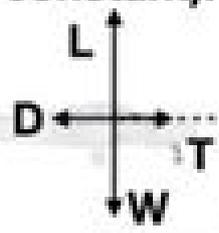

Flight path changes almost immediately, as a result of large change in lift.

Climb rate slows down, because lift is now less than required for level flight due to reduction of AOA because of the upward flight path.

Climb continues at slower airspeed.

Throttle only

(Pitch constant):

Engine response time: time it takes engine to develop more thrust after throttle is advanced.

Lift increases gradually as airspeed increases.

Flight path changes due to lift increase.

Note that in this drawing we kept pitch constant, not angle of attack. With AOA constant, airspeed would not increase, but pitch attitude would.

Airplane ends up climbing at a faster airspeed, because angle of attack is smaller.
