What is Architecture Diagram

An architecture is a collection of system components and their relationships. Architecture can be simply defined as a conceptual business architecture, application architecture, data architecture, and technical architecture.

- Business architecture (or a macro-architecture) is concerned with the boundaries of the business, including the product groups. It is the plan or form the business.
- Application architecture is the overall architecture of the whole system implementation. It needs to capture the look of the system, the principles of system development, and the application services at each level of the system.
- Data architecture is a set of architectural for defining data, which defines data according to system application domains and type of different data groups. For instance, all data inherently, available, primary, active, static, and distributed data sources. The main goal of this level is data architecture.
- Technical architecture The architectural solution has itself a close connection with which applications are implemented. It is the plan or form of the system development, and with which technologies you need to get throughout the build process. The technical architectural should describe the design requirements of the operational architecture, and carry out the technical details according to the operational technical requirements. It describes the relationships between both new technology and current technology ready.

How to Draw an Architecture Diagram

- Figure out what level of architecture diagram to draw.
- Identify key elements in the architecture diagram and, possibly, sub-diagrams, services.
- Set out the relationships between key elements (business, support, service, etc).
- Finalize an architecture diagram with clear descriptions.
