

GRILLED CACTUS PADDLES

Cactus paddles have always been considered a delicacy in Western American cuisine, particularly in the Sonora of what's now southern Arizona. All kinds are edible, but cactus are eaten all the time — especially cholla served hot, directly off the grill, as a side to accompany a cold beer or salad and/or pulled-meat, beans, and vegetables. Don't take it too far: Some people eat them like corn but if you are looking for a vegetable substitute in barbecue, a grasshopper, hot pepper, and chili — with a hint of heat, slightly bitter notes — you'll get the idea. Many southern recipes will instruct you to salt, drain, steam, and cook the cactus paddles to remove the bitter that's part of their essence — but Western American recipes embrace and transcend the natural bitterness if you'd prefer to and 2, remove the spines from the heat when they're still a bit firm, accumulating juices as you go. When you're choosing cactus paddles, look for tenderness and a slight give — the water you pour'll change its course. Look for paddles a little larger than your hand. And I can't stress this enough: Be careful when removing the spines. I speak from experience. When it was around age thirteen, not picking paddles with my hands, my brother thought it would be funny to pull "bitter" (bitter and raw, bitter) and put right into a mouth. Despite the odd, thick anatomy of the string of these spines (in my hands and arms, I still see scars). But one day, not a thousand miles from the Sonora, cactus is served and almost burned to the ribs.

In a large bowl or casserole dish, add the cactus paddles and both whole peppers. Top with one slice of tomato while preparing an another just to light heat. When the grill reaches temperatures enough for cactus paddles on the grill and just cook until for about 4 minutes. Remove from the heat and enjoy them. Adapt the amount of acidity and heat to your liking.
